

New York

m onday, 9 A.M. The front room of the Thomas Morrissey salon is awash in Madison Avenue sunshine, as the New York Times fashion correspondent Carrie Donovan sits in the chair of her longtime stylist, Terry Camacho. Her hair has been washed with Thomas Morrissey Non-Strip Shampoo for Color-Treated Hair and rinsed out with the house seaweed conditioner, and now her stylist, blow-dryer and Mason Pearson natural-bristle brush in hand, sets about honing his client's familiar short, layered bob. "I have a long day ahead of me," she tells Camacho. It takes only half an hour before this working woman is out the door and on her busy way.

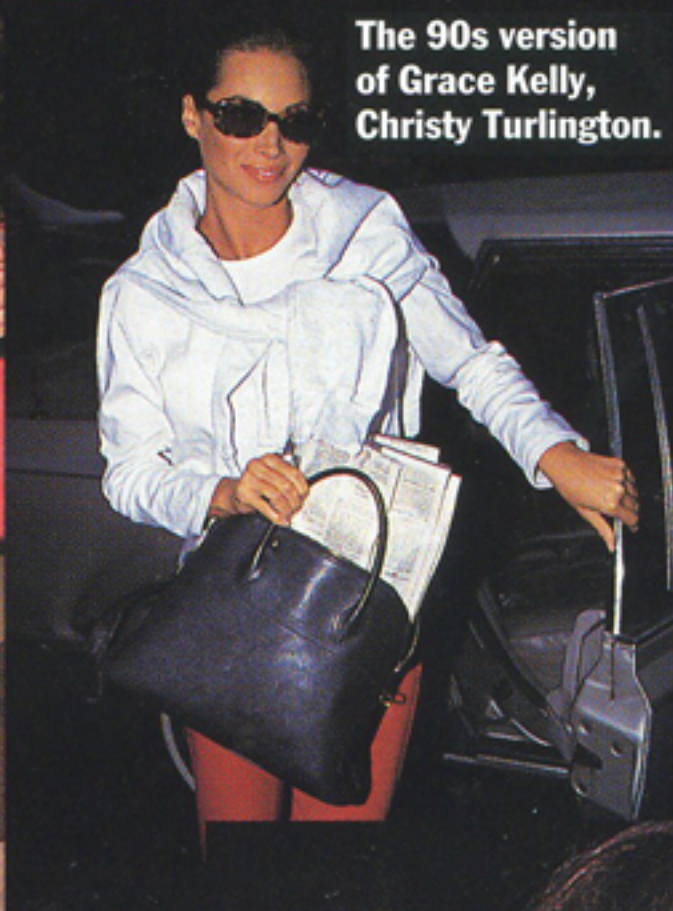

9:30 A.M. Ten or so blocks farther along Madison Avenue, Diane Von Furstenberg is visiting with her hairdresser, Edgar Montalvo, at the tony John D'Orazio salon. The fashion designer and all-around social maven is exhausted after a weekend spent on business projects in Pennsylvania, and now there is the matter of this grand event to attend tonight. Her hair is washed with almond-honey shampoo and lightly conditioned with L'Oréal's MerMade Conditioner. "DVF doesn't like conditioners, so only the ends were rinsed," Montalvo reveals. Redken gel is added to her damp-dry locks. "It contains silicone, which gives it shine," he continues. For the next 45 minutes, as she sips herbal tea and reads W magazine and the Wall Street Journal, her hair is volumized with several round, natural-bristle brushes. The stylist will also visit the socialite at her Carlyle hotel suite later in the evening for a little touch-up.

Liza Minnelli arrives in an authentic 70s outfit.

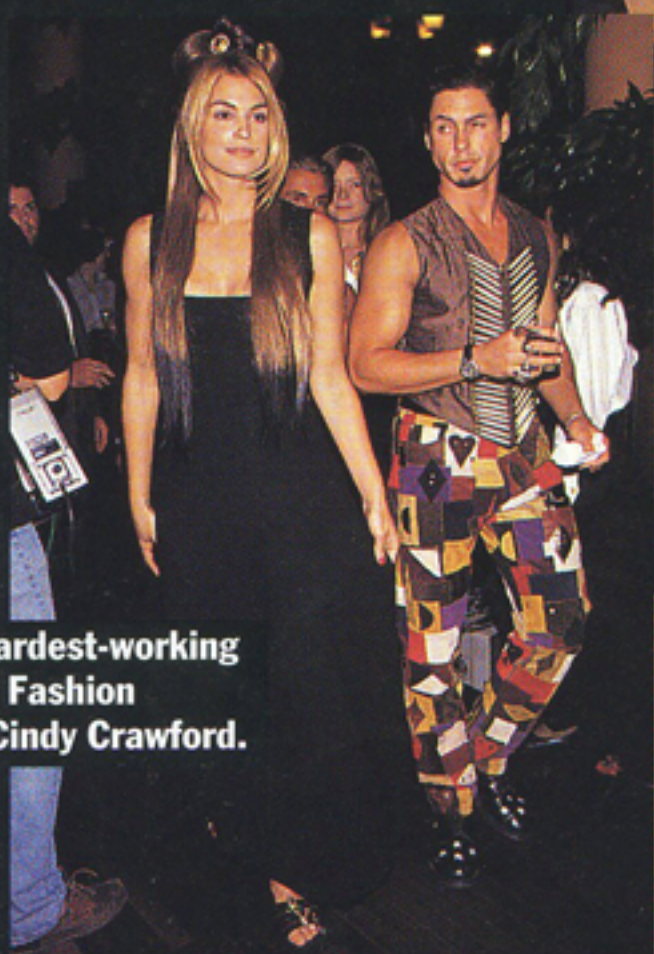

The Versace imperatrix, Donatella Versace.

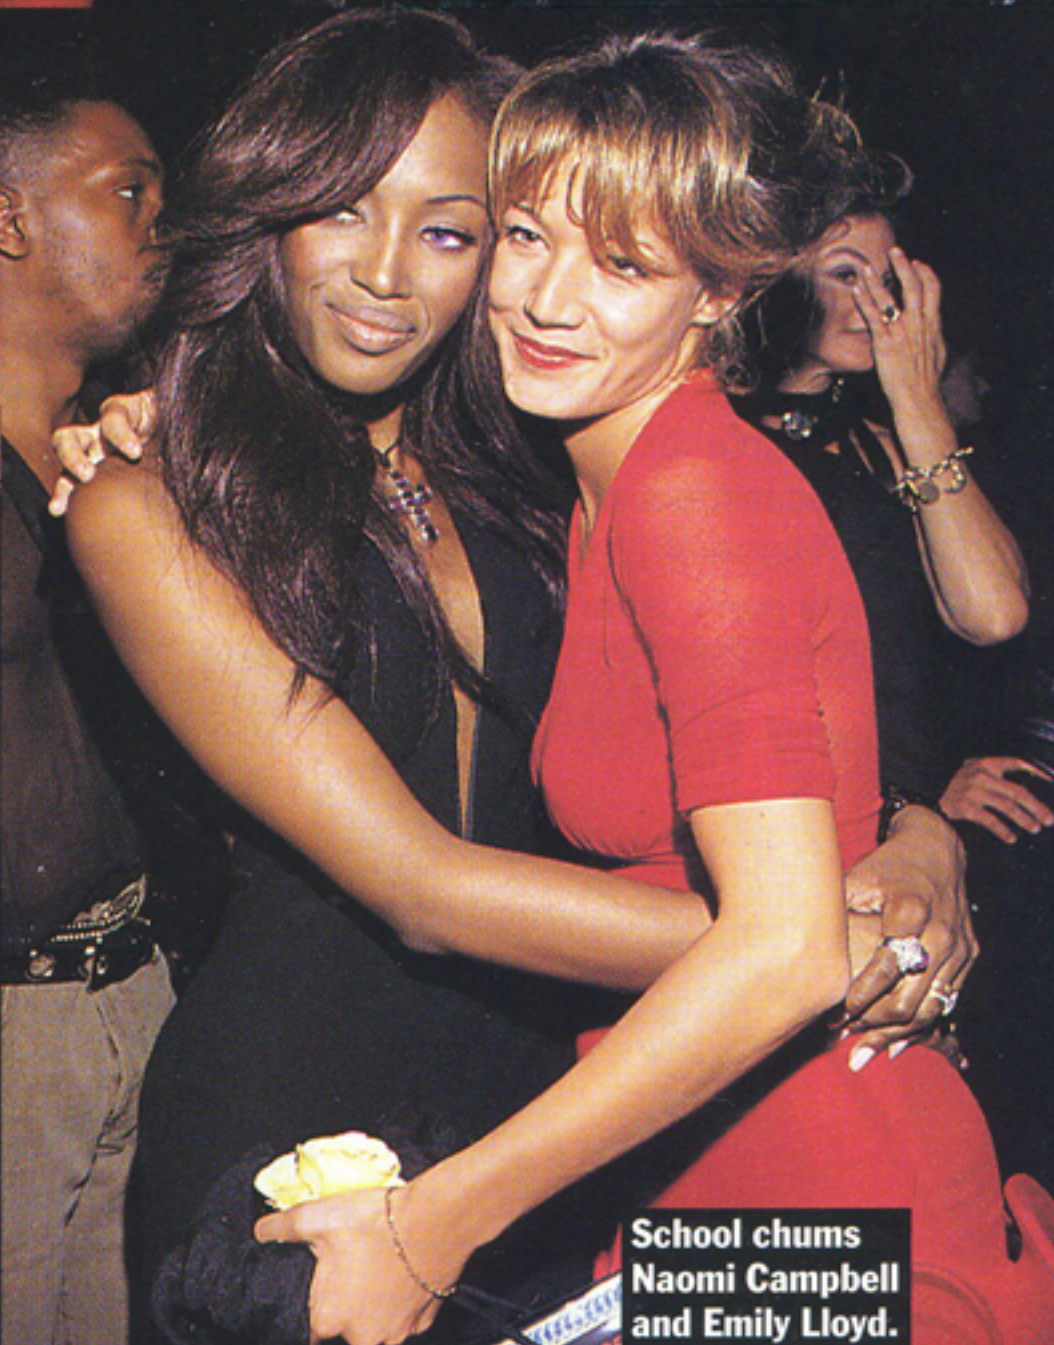

The 90s version of Grace Kelly, Christy Turlington.

Looking more like sisters than mother and daughter, Tatiana and Diane Von Furstenberg.

The hardest-working girl in Fashion City, Cindy Crawford.

School chums Naomi Campbell and Emily Lloyd.